ABSTRACT

The paper compares identity issues of Taiwanese and Singaporean Minnan populations, focusing on how political and educational influences have shaped their identity today. Using means of survey results and textbook analysis, the author argues that policies implemented by different governmental agendas influence identity formation, by means of shaping education trends and society needs. Also, the existence of a competing group is crucial to the outlining of identity borders.